UniSIM is considering co-locating its new law school at the State or Family Justice courts being built in Havelock Road (left), a recommendation put forward by a panel including (below, from left) Senior Counsel N. Sreenivasan, UniSIM president Cheong Hee Kiat and Senior Minister of State for Law Indranee Rajah.

ST PHOTOS
WONG KHAI CHOW

UniSIM law school to open in January

It will specialise in family and criminal law, and 80% of the 60 places will go to mature students.

Sandra Davie
Senior Education Correspondent

Targeting mid-career professionals thinking of becoming criminal or family lawyers, Singapore’s much-awaited third law school at SM University (UniSIM) will open next January.

Applications for the 60 places in the course will open next month, with 80 per cent going to mature students. The rest of the places will go to A-level school leavers and polytechnic diploma holders. The classes will be conducted in the evening.

Those who already hold a first degree will take up the Juris Doctor course, while fresh school leavers will be offered the Bachelor of Laws. Juris Doctor students are expected to take three to six years to complete the degree, while LL.B. students take four to six years.

Tuition fees have yet to be finalised but are not expected to differ much from those of the other two law schools, which charge S$2,400 a year for the LL.B. course.

The Ministry of Law, which announced the details yesterday, said UniSIM is exploring the idea of setting up a campus at the State or Family Justice courts in Havelock Road.

Senior Minister of State for Law Indranee Rajah, who headed a 12-member panel to provide strategic direction for the school, said the UniSIM Law School, as it will be called, will address the looming shortage of lawyers in the fields of criminal and family law.

She noted that fresh graduates generally choose not to enter these fields and, among those who do, there are high attrition rates due to the long hours and emotional demands. The shortage will become more acute as senior practitioners retire, she added.

Currently there are about 1,600 lawyers practising in these two fields, though many do not practise exclusively in them.

Close to 170 are over the age of 65, said Ms Indranee, adding that an average of 30 lawyers will be retiring yearly over the next decade.

She said: “So there is a hollowing-out effect. If we don’t do something, in the longer term, we are going to have a problem as there is a real need for practising criminal and family lawyers.”

She said that the panel had recommended co-locating the law school at the State or Family Justice courts to support the emphasis on practice.

“If you want to be a practitioner, you have to be in the thick of things,” she said, adding that the location also makes it convenient for the adjunct faculty, who will be practising lawyers.

UniSIM president Cheong Hee Ki at said the new law school hopes to draw mature individuals with experience in related fields such as social work and forensic science will prepare students for family and criminal legal work.

Mr Chew, a lawyer for 27 years, has also served as a Deputy Public Prosecutor, State Counsel and Senior District Judge in the State Courts.

sandra@sph.com.sg